Birth of a new league

By Steve K. Walz

At least 13 maverick millionaires representing 13 cities have banded together to form the United States Football League, a new pro league that hopes to lure seemingly insatiable gridiron fans, with its spring-summer schedule starting next year.

In order to insure the league's survival, the initial 13 franchise holders (Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Tampa, Washington, D.C., Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Houston, Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles and San Diego) were asked to ante up a total of more than $100 million.

According to one prospective owner who requested anonymity, the franchise holders have the resources to attract blue-chip athletes from the collegiate and pro ranks.

"We expect to be competitive in every aspect with the National Football League, including the signing of top athletes, not just lower- or middle round college players, as has been erroneously reported," says the would-be owner.

"We hope to attract these players with the opportunity to play close to their homes. We will have a territorial rights draft, as opposed to an NFL-type draft. This makes it more lucrative when it comes to getting a network TV contract and attracting fans."

The same person also says that the league is pledged to signing name coaches only, in order to gain credibility.

According to one report, three ex-pro coaches have been approached: Chuck Fairbanks (Patriots), Hank Stram (Chiefs, Saints) and Red Miller (Broncos).

The USFL is still looking to sign a contract with a major television network, but the owners are confident that once the rosters are stocked with top-name athletes, the networks will warm to the league.

How can these daring men be so sure that they will get a network deal even with top-name stars? The anonymous franchise owner claimed that a recent survey by Frank Magid Associates, a specialized TV consulting firm, found that telecasts of the new league's games would attract 82 percent of those people who watch NFL football.

Can the USFL challenge the NFL for allegiance of America's gridiron fans?
