A Case of Intermigration.

H. M. KINGERY.

If you are not gone for good, Mr. Ridenhood, it would be something to know where you are hiding at present. --our Mutual Friend. One summer day in 1880, I boarded a ferry boat at Detroit, with the intention of crossing the river to Windsor. It was a holiday, and the boat was crowded. I was standing, or rather leaning against the rail with a number of strangers, when a sudden move-ment of the crowd caused me to lose my balance and fall headlong into the water. Consciousness did not desert me immediately, for I remember clutching at another unfortunate who and shared my fall, and sinking with him. There was the rush of recollection so often described by those who have escaped drowning, and then, so far as scenes of earth are concerned, all was blank.

Still I seemed to retain my individuality. It seemed to me I had left the green earth, and was somewhere out in space. The silence was absolute, and I could see nothing. Unable to bear, or to see, or to feel—in fact, to exercise any of the senses of the physical life, I still was conscious of some presence near me. The sensation, if such it may be called, was unlike any I had experienced in life. The nearest approach to it was the undefined, uneasy feeling which sometimes at night will tell you, without light or sound, that you were not alone. I had noticed it more than once in the course ot my life, and being something of a dabbler in psychological puzzles had formed various hypotheses to account for the fact. Was it some bodily sensation that told of the presence in the room? Was it the heat of the body; or some slight sound not recognized as sound but appreciated only by the mental state which was in effect; or was the impression gained through some other sense in a manner so subtile that the agency of the scene was not detected? Or, on the other hand, was the cause not physical and psychical-was it some mysterious power in mind which recognized, without the aid of sense, the presense of another?

These questions I had often pondered, and had found quite as fascinating and as useful as the owl of the fable found the old question as to which was created first, the ben or the egg. But now they assumed a new meaning, and the solution seemed to be offered Evidently I no longer possessed a body. Any doubts I ever had felt as to the independent existence of the soul were resolved. I had no sensation, and when put forth the effort of will which usually produced the opening of my eyes, no vision followed. Neither could I lift an arm, nor perform any of the thousand common actions of our every-day life. Surely I had left my body—abandoned it to death and decay. Yet the thought did not seem painful. Indeed, I was conscious of a new and strange freedom of thought which more than compensated for the loss of body and sense. Hampered no longer by the slow clumsy movements of the material brain, I seemed to think with a marvelous facility, and to solve in a flash problems which had puzzled me hopelessly before. Yet with it all I had no power of senseno sight, no hearing, no feeling.

For some time that state continued, and I reveled in this freedom and superior knowledge. But suddenly there came over me a sense of constraint. My new powers of thought became clogged, and with this unwelcome coninement came anew the power of sense. An effort of the will enabled me to move my eye-lids, and at the same instant I heard some one say, "He is alive. Slowly life and strength returned to my body. When at length I was able to raise myself and look about, I found I was lying in a house by the river side A physician was standing near with a gratified expression on his face. When he saw me move, he said, "Well, sir, you have had a narrow escape from drowning, but you are all right now. Looking around, my eye was caught by another form lying near which was slowly regaining consciousness through the efforts of a second physi-There was something very familiar in the whole outline, and even in the clothing of the prostrate form, but I could not decide what it was. So

I finally lay back exhausted with the effort, and went to sleep. Some hours later I awoke and found the physicians gone and the stranger sitting on the edge of his bunk, rubbing his eyes and collecting his energies for further movements. The figure seemed more familiar than ever. and when at length he rose and turned toward where I was lying, an object caught my eye which caused me to spring up and say:

"Hello! What are you doing with my water?". Then I stopped in amazement, the my voice sounded strangely thin, and shrill—so unlike my own deep atones that I could hardly believe it was my voice.

Butzmeswonder was increased tenfold when my own voice of old replied, "Your watch! What are you thinking of?" and then he stopped as much surprised as I had been. Drawing it from his pocket, I noticed that he tried first a pocket on the other side, as if he expected to find it there—he stared at the watch with a look of utter amaze-

I put my hand to my pocket where carried my watch and found it gone! But just as I was about to demand it again as my property, I felt something on the other side, and hastily drawing it forth, found a watch totally different from my own. "What are you doing with

"It is a strange performance, certainly. I must have taken a cold in the water, for my voice never sounded so heavy before." "Nor mine so shrill. If it were a possible thing, I should say that they

If I had met you I certainly should have taken the liberty to speak, for I myself was so striking—even to the scar over the left ear," I added, as he turned his head for an instant. "A scar? I have no scar," and he raised his hand to the place indisputable of the scar's presence. "Worse and worse! How can I have got that? It doesn't seem to be fresh, looking for bald than you are—why, how is this?" for on touching the place named, I found a spot unmistakably bare and smooth. At the same instant my companion ran his finger through the thick hair which covered his head without a break, and finding no such baldness as he had described, stood there the picture of helpless bewilderment. "Pinch me, strike me, do something to rouse me. This is a strange dream -a dreaded nightmare," he cried. "Your position is no more strange than mine," I replied. "But let us reexchange our suits. I feel strong enough to go home." "All right. But I do not understand this at all." "No more do I." We removed our outer garments, and found that the exchange was complete throughout. Exchanging, we began to don our own vestments. "Why, how is this? I can't get into my own garments!" exclaimed my companion-in-misery. I had been more successful, and now stood entirely "clothed," if not "in my right mind". And truly there seem to be grave doubts on the last point, for surely no man in his sense ever fell into such a succession of absurd catastrophies.

"Your coat doesn't seem to hang right," remarked my companion, breathlessly, as he endeavored in vain to button round his neck collar that was a full inch too short.

"You are mistaken, sir," I replied. This suit was made to order by my ravorite tailor, and I never had a bet-Saying which I drew the garment in question together in front, intending to button it up, and show the smoothness of its set. To my horror, instead of the neat fit of the morning, it was overlapped no less than four inches! "Have I shrank so far?" I faltered. "If you have shrunken I have swollen," was the reply; "for I can do nothing with this coat." And, truly, he was a comic spectacle, with his feet and ankles projecting from the tightly stretched trousers which extended barely half-way between knee and ankle, and his bare wrists protruded from the sleeves which threatened to split from the unwonted mass of muscle thrust into them. "We'll have to yield," he said at last "and make the exchange of armor. But how this has come about is a mys tery too deep for me to solve. Look here!" he cried, his eyes staring almost from their places in his brow. 'These are not my hands!"

"These are not my hands," I echoed, staring at the small, white members which now held the place of my own strong, sun-browned hands. "Nor my feet! Are we mad?"

"You have my whiskers, too, while I am smooth-shaven." I had not noticed it before, now the fact was evident. Without daring to investigate further for fear of provoking the Puck who seemed to be mocking up to some new freak, we resumed as quickly as possible the garments in which we had found ourselves clothed on awakening, and then, almost beside ourselves with wonder and fear at the strange transformation, we left the Walking up the street together we passed a group of three or four men who were standing at the entrance to bank. Just us we passed one of them stepped forward and called, "Professor Jones!" My companion turned and said:

"Oh, Mr. Brown, good afternoon. did not notice you in the group." The man who was a stranger to me, stared at him in surprise and replied: "I beg pardon, sir. It was to your friend I spoke."

Then turning to me, he said: "Professor, we were just speaking of the university. My friend here -Mr. Robertson, Professor Jones—is a representative of an Eastern Newspaper, and would like some information concerning the institution. As you are in all its secrets, I'll just refer him to you, if I may." "I beg pardon, but you are mistaken.

I am not a professor, nor am I connected in any capacity in any univer-Mr. Brown smiled incredulously, and the reporter said: "I am sorry you have such a dread of an 'interview', but I promise not to abuse any confidence you may repose I was about to reply with a further disclaimer, when my companion, who had listened with impatience, broke in: "You seem to have confused our identity in your mind, Mr. Brown. I am Jones, of the university, and this gentleman I never met till to-day." "This is a strange farce," said Mr. Brown. "Surely I have seen Professor Jones often enough in the class-room and out of it to recognize him when we meet. I never knew him before to deny his identity." "I do not deny it, sir. On the contrary I protest against being thrust aside and have my title given to a stranger." Mr. Brown laughed and, turning to his companion, said: "Well, Mr. Robertson, I'm afraid you cannot gain much information from Professor Jones to-day. I am sorry, too, for he could give you what no other could."

The two gentleman bowed, and my companion, after a moment's hesitation, as if he would make further protest, gave a haughty bow and we passed on together up the street. On the way I met numerous acquaintances, and saluted them as usual, but strangly enough, they seemed always to address my companion in reply, barely giving me a surprised glance. On the other hand, I received many a cordial bow "So are mine. This is the height of from men who were utter strangers to where it chanced we both were stopping. I had come in late the night before, and had taken a room there irstead of going farther up town to the house I usually stopped when in the city. Professor Jones had two rooms, he told me, on the second floor, and had his wife and children with him. My room was on the same floor, two or three doors away on the opposite of the spacious hall. We went up the broad staircase together, and separated at his door with mutual congratulations. Hardly had he stopped inside when heard a scream, and before I had opened my door a lady whom I had never seen before rushed out into the hall, looked wildly up and down its length, and then seeing me, ran toward me and threw her arms around my neck, imploring me to save her from "that man", who, she added, had

"come into her room and insulted her." "What did he do?" I asked. "Threw his arms around my neck, said something about a narrow escape from drowning,' and tried to kiss meoh! keep him off, John, he's coming at me again." And sure enough my friend of the morning's adventure had recovered from the paralysis of wonder into which the scene had thrown him, and was approaching us with anything but a friendly expression of countenance.

The lady clung to me more closely than ever, sobbing and entreating me to "keep iim away". To add to the embarrassment of my position, the oc-cupants of other rooms near by were attracted by the uproar, and quite a crowd had gathered. These strangers were looking on with amused expectation of "a scene". Meantime I tried o disengage and explain matters, but the more I struggled the more tightly clung the lady, until I was fairly desparate. Fancy a youth just out of college in such a position—a lady no longer young clinging tightly to his shoulders, and claiming him as her husband, while a crowd of grinning spectators stood enjoying his perplexi ty. Moreover my quondam friend with my suit and my face and hands was at hand, and his threatening looks were anything but reassuring.

"Let go my wife," he cried. "That is what I am trying to do. Take her, and win my gratitude." "Mary, what does this mean? Are you mad?" "Who are you? I don't know you at all. This is my husband," and she clung more tightly than before. The situation was growing desperate. could not prevail on the lady to release me by any arguments I could master. She was rapidly growing hysterical, and her husband was thoroughly angry It was strange. The wife appeared old enough to be the husband's mother, and it seemed increditable that the tall boy of sixteen who now came on the scene and rushed to his mother's aid, could be the son of so youthful a father. Still, as I was certain morally and intellectually that they were not my wife and son, as he claimed them as his, I was entirely willing to let it be so. At last I broke loose with a desperate effort, rushed into my room and locked the door. As I fled I heard the derisive laughter of some of the spectators, and even overheard one or two of the younger and less reverent comment on the scene somewhat after this fashion: 'See the old one cut and run!" "He's brave, isn't he?"

"Is he her husband?" "Yes; I think so. At least I have seen them together at table." "Why, that is Professor Jones of the university. This is a queer proceedrg. He must be crazy for the mo-

"Who is this young fellow who pretends the lady is his wife?" "I don't know. He came in only last night. I noticed him at breakfast, but not at dinner. Fine figure, hasn't

These last remarks were uttered in a low tone by persons standing near my door, as they moved away to this point, I lost anything further they may have said. Alone at last, I tried to recollect my thoughts, but was surprised to find that my nerves, which up to that day had been so strong and firm that no excitement or danger had sufficed to shake them, were quivering now, and that my whole body was trembling and twitching as in a palsy. The scene through which I had passed had been an exciting one truly, and unusually trying, but even that and the plunge in the river were not enough to account for the entire prostration which felt. Utterly worn out I gave up the effort, threw myself upon the bed and went to sleep. It was dark when I awoke. I lit the gas, and finding my nerves entirely steady now, sat down to write a letter. I was but newly engaged to be married so it is not difficult to guess to whom the epistle was to be addressed. Sitting down I took the pen and began but hardly had two lines been written when a new marvel caused me to drop the pen from a nerveless hand and stare at the paper in stupid wonder. I had written the date-line, and part of the usual tender address, when something struck me as peculiar in the appearance of the writing. Looking more closely I found that the characters I had been wont to form, what I had written appeared in the finest and daintiest Italian script. In vain I attempted to write as usual. I could increase the size of the letters but they never resembled the forms I knew so well. It seems as if my hand—if it were my hand—had lost in a few hours its old habit and acquired another which ordinarily would require months of practice. For I believe that one's chirography truly "hand writing," and depends for its character more on the exercise and cultivation of muscles than on any mental quality. However that may be my writing-for I knew that it never would do to send Marian a letter written in such a hand and signed with my name-I threw down my pen once more and began to exchange my water-spoiled clothing for a clean suit. I took down the black suit I had brought with me for "state occasions", and put it on. But here again I met a disappointment. For, as I would, the suit could not be made to fit. Every peace hung upon me in loose folds, so that I resembled a street boy in his gathered-up suit in men's cast-off garments rather than a well dressed young man. But all my wondering and staring did no good, and at last, with a hopeless sense of being the victim of a horrid nightmare, and with a half-crazy feeling of repentance at having ever been scepti-cal with regard to the old stories of fairies and genii, I donned the old suit again.

As I adjusted the coat I stepped the first time before the mirror, to arrange my tie and collar. Oh, horrors! that was not my face nor my figure. In the morning when I had stood there last, I had been a stalwart, ruddy-faced youth, six feet tall, with thick, glossy hair, and only the faintest dawn of a mustache. And now-now there stared back at me from the glass, with round, wide-open, horror eyes, a little, stooped figure with parchment-like skin, straggling whiskers and bald

At length we reached the hotel crown—the whole as utterly unlike what I had thought myself to be as one well can conceive. Thinking a trick had been played upon me, I burst open my valise and snatched from it the hand-glass I carried there. But it told me the same story. Weak, trembling, oppressed by a new dread of this mysterious, pres-

'Yes, answered another voice.
"They've arrested the young fellow who pretends to be Professor Jones. He is mad, evidently. He struggled so that it took two policemen to master him and take him away." "I wonder what the other-the true Jones-means by his conduct."

"I don't know. He always had a great reputation. Possibly too much study has turned his brain. "Poor fellow. I pity his wife. She has been in hysterics all the afternoon. There, you can hear her now." "Yes. Will anything be done with him to night?

"No; I think not. They'll leave him here till morning in the hope he will come around all right." "Well, as you say, it is a strange case. I shall lock and bolt my door to night. There's no telling what will happen with a madman in the house. The speakers separated, one entering the apartment adjoining my own, and the other going into his room on the opposite side of the hall. I heard enough to convince me that my only safety lay in flight. But safety from what? Flight whither? If this were not all a fearful nightmare if I really had become so changed in form and appearance, it would be useless to seek my friends, for they would not recognize me. How could they know me if I come to them not as a young man in my own proper person, but as a middle-aged professor, my very antipodes every respect. On the other hand—the thought startled me as it came up—could I personate the man whose form I had unwittingly assumed? Could I go to the university, assume the position and relations, and be what I seemed-Professor Jones? Plainly that was impossible. In the first place I had not his knowledge. His department was one in which the deepest knowledge and most earnest research were requisite. The stooped shoulders and bald crown were evidences of the severity of their rightful owner's studies. I was a recent graduate from college, and while I stood well in my class, was no more competent to fill the place of such a man than to regulate the universe.

In our study of mental science the various views of mind and matter and their relations had been presented and discussed by one professor and the dear." The words nearly choked me, class. The general idea of material- for I was no adebt at deception; but ism had struck my fancy, and with the pseudo-independence of youth I had revolted from the orthodox camp and joined those whose efforts are directed to the banishment of mind from the universe. I maintained that thought was merely the action of the brainmatter vaguely called "the laws of its being," and that memory and knowledge consisted in acquired habit of ac-

The theories were decidedly upset

by this day's experiences. If that view were the true one, and if, by some inexplicable freak of the "laws of nature," I had, as everything seemed to indicate, become possessed—you see I cannot express the idea without the use of terms implying an entity separate from the corporal existence-become possessed of this man's body then I must have become essentially this man. Since the body is the man, when the body became mine—or myself-I must have acquired with it the brain, and hence the power of thought and the knowledge which were its own. But the fact was very different. While there now was no doubt in my mind—that awkward admission again -that this was the professor's body, and hence that the brain must be his and contain, at least potentially, the knowledge for which he was so famous, I found that no effort of the will could make me seem other than the young graduate. My own meagre experience of life and men was all I could recall, and there was no glimmer of the profound learning and large experience which I know the professor possessed. The fact seemed to be that had acquired his body, and with it its aches and pains, as a sharp twinge of rheumatic pain now reminded me, but nothing more. In the exchange there had been, the advantage was all on his side. I had the feeble mental developement of a boy with a wornout body, while he had the vigorous, cultured mind, and with it a youthful, perfectly healthy body. How utterly unfair it was to me! But wait a moment. Was his position the ideal I thought it? His wife and children never could recognize him in his new form. In fact if he should ever attempt to claim them and his old position his actions would be viewed as those of a maniac, and most probably he would end his life in an asylum. Then, perhaps, sometime a friend of mine might see him in my body, and mourn me as having met a fate worse than death. In fact, who knew but the morning might see me arrested for some impossible crime of family-deserting, and finally lock me up as a mad man? The thought made me spring to my feet. Clearly it would not do to attempt a personation of Professor Jones. even if I could bring myself to disregard the moral and religious training of my early years so far as to impose upon his friends in such a manner. I let my valise from the window, slipped out a private door, and left the hotel. In spite of my conviction that it would be useless. I determined to visit home. Stepping from the train. I met at the station one of my most intimate friends. I forgot my misfortune, and rushed up to him with the exclamation:

met with a stare and the chilly reply: "You must be mistaken in your man." Too disheartened to say more, I walked up the street to my father's house, and there, once more forgetting, I hurried into the room where my

"Why, mother, don't you know me?" And I sank into a chair and covered my face with my hands. "Mother! Know you! No, sir, I do not. You must be intoxicated. Leave the room immediately!"

Seeing the uselessness of further appeal, I withdrew. Determined to make one last attempt, however, I waited inside of the gate till my father and brother came home. cried. "Why, father," said my brother, "he is as old as you are!" "Yes; the man must be crazy, poor fellow," answered my father and they turned away.

This was too much too bear, and hrowing myself before them, I said: "No, I am not mad. I am the victim of the strangest calamity. I seem to have lost my own body and to have entered another. I cannot tell you so you will understand, but I am truly your son. Oh, do take me in to my mother?" "I never saw you before. Move on, or I'll have you arrested,"

His manner convinced me that further entreaty was useless. I returned to the station and there took the first train that passed. It chanced to be bound for the North. Before we had traveled many miles the idea occurred to me to visit Ann Arbor. It was nearly dark when I stepped off the train. I wandered aimlessly toward the university grounds. At length a quick-moving, energetic young man vertook me and said:

"Good-evening, Professor. Are you going to the concert to-night?" "What concert?" I asked. "I have been out of town." "Oh, so you have. This is a concert given by some of the students.' "I fear I shall have to miss it. My work has accumulated in my absence.' "I am sorry, for you would enjoy it. But here is your house. Good-evening. So this was my house. I looked at it with interest. A fine, roomy dwelling, set far back from the street in a specious yard. Well-paved walks led from the gates to the entrance, while all was shaded by magnificent old oaks and linders. After a moment's hesitation, I walked up to the great double doors and rang. The door opened, and a servant greeted me as "Professor," and, adding that Mrs. Jones was in the library, left me alone in the hall. Here was another quandary. I was not especially anxious to meet Mrs Jones after the scene in the hotel, yet I did not care to seem ignorant of the arrangement of my own house. I went forward boldly, and opened a door through whose keyhole a bright ray fell into the dimly lighted hall. It chanced to be the right door, for there, sitting beside a large writing-table, was Mrs. Jones. Her face wore an anxious. worried expression, as she sat with her elbow on the table, supporting her head in her hand. On my entrance she sprang up and, simply exclaiming "Oh, John!" stood

Not knowing what else I could do, I advanced toward her, and in an instant had her, weeping quietly, in my arms. No reference was made to the unhappy hotel scene, for all she said was: "I'm so glad you have come back."

they seemed to satisfy her, for she took my arm and said: "Now you must see the children. Charley! Maud! Papa is here." The boy I had seen in the hotel, and a bright little girl of twelve, came flying in. Maud kissed me and nestled m my lap, but Charlie gave his hand rather coldly. We nad a pleasant tea together, though during its progress I had to be on my guard constantly, lest some careless word should show how little I knew of what was familiar to them all. In fact, if I had felt any doubt before, I was thoroughly convinced then of the utter impossibility of playing in real life the part of the man whose person and name had been thrust upon me so strangely.

When tea was over I retired to the library, desiring to be left alone, on the plea that I was very busy-even rejecting Mrs. Jones' offer to sit with me and help me with my papers-and there waited till all was quiet in the house. Then, extinguishing the lights, I slipped out cautiously. At the railroad station I took a south-bound train for—anywhere. I still had one resource. Unrecognized by friends, claimed by strangers, and cast off by my own parents, I was so lonely and wretched that I determined to risk all in one last appeal to Marian. It was evening when I approached the house, and Marian was sitting alone, as I had found her often before, on the vine-sheltered porch. She was humming a bright little air, of which we both

A Wax Corpse in a Coffin. The sight of patent air-tight coffins and the improved paraphernalia of death in undertakers' windows on populous thoroughfares is a familiar enough feature in New York life. It often shocks foreigners but they soon become accustomed to it as we have done. But walking along First-ave. the other day I saw a small crowd looking in a window and, attracted by my own inveterate curiosity, I joined them. It was the window of an undertaker's shop. Placed on iron supports was a coffin, elaborately decorated. Inside the coffin was the waxen effigy of a corpse, and I am bound to say that it was exceedingly lifelike, if I may be pardoned the bull. But it sent a shiver through me that I could

It is not so with the Republicans when Mr. Cleveland started out. They are all anxious to have him come west and learn something, recognizing the disadvantage a man must labor under as chief executive when he has never seen any part of the country further west than Dunkirk.

At a recent social gathering in Cincinnati some Democratic enthusiast. refering to the President's battle flag letter, denounced the Grand Army of the Republic as a lot of cranks. Special Pension Examiner Chas. II. Behle, being an old soldier, was incensed at this, and in some plain language resented it. The matter was reported to Pension Commissioner Black who ordered the dismissal of Beble. The love of the Democratic party for the soldiers who fought on this side twenty-five years ago, never was much of a burden to it.

There is just now considerable comment on the prospective candidates for the Presidency next year, and it will doubtless continue until the conventions are held. Straw votes taken now show Blaine to be in the lead, as first choice. The Republicans may be foolish enough to nominate him again, but if they do it will look considerable as if they had no other man. One fair trial with a candidate is enough. If he could not be elected the first time trying he never can, and the party will simply meet defeat worse than before if it tries him again, notwithstanding his great statesmanship and magnetic qualities.

W. J. Mc Garigle, one of the Chicago boodlers under three years sentence to State prison, by a sharp ruse on the sheriff managed to escape, Saturday night, and is still at large. The sheriff took him to his own home to get a clean change of clothing and a bath, and when he entered the bath-room was the last seen of him by the sheriff. He was under bonds amounting to $65,000 for his appearance for trial in a number of cases still pending against him. McGarigle was one of the leading democratic politicians of Chicago, a prominent candidate for sheriff, U.S. marshal, and a number of other important offices, and for a long time was chief of police.

An outspoken burst of sentiment emblematic of Democracy appeared in the Louisville Courier Journal, edited by Henry Watterson, the head and acknowledged mouth piece of the Demoeratic party. Every old soldier, whether Democratic or Republican, should read it and know what the chief supporter of the present administration thinks of them. Speaking of the G. A. Chain Gangs for Teachers. We print in another part of this paper a letter from Atlanta, Ga., setting forth the history of a bill now pending in the Georgia Legislature "to regulate the manner of conducting educational institutions in this State, and to protect the rights of colored and white people and provide penalties for the infraction of this act." In substance this barbarous measure provides that any teacher or manager of any school who shall educate black and white children together shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, imprisonment not to exceed six months, or work on a chain gang not to exceed twelve months, or by all these penalties at the discretion of the court. It applies to all the schools of the State, but it is aimed specially at the Atlanta University, founded by the American Missionary Association for the education of colored youths and supported by the people of the North, who have given it over $350,000. Under the policy of this association its doors are open to any student, and because a few whites have found their way there—the children of professors who would have been ostracized had they tried to go to white schools, because their parents were "nigger teachers"-this brutal bill has been in-

This is in the very heart of that New South of which we have heard so much. The university is in the very city which is claimed to be the center of the New South. The prophet of the New South who vaticinated with such fizzing eloquence at the New England dinner lives there. What does the New South propose in this matter? To send these hardworking noble-hearted Christian teachers to the chain gang if they admit their own children, who would be exposed to continual insult if they went to school elsewhere, or any other white pupils into this institution! And what does the chain gang penalty mean? It means to place men and tender women in shackles by the side of the convicts to labor on the road, in the factories, or in the fields, or to let out their service to brutal contractors.

And one who has read the official reports of grand juries in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi knows what the horrors of the chain gang are. The black hole of Calcutta or the old prison ships alone convey an idea of the suf-fering of the Southern chain gang. It is given out that the Legislature is ready to pass this odious bill and that the Governor of the State is disposed to sign it. In the name and for the sake of common humanity it is to be hoped that such is not the case. It cannot be that in this free Republic and in this year of our Lord teachers can be sent to chain gang for doing the work of Him who is no respector of persons .- Chicago Tribune.

For the next 430 feet varying shades of slate were passed. Trenton rock was struck 800 feet from the surface. This rock is exceedingly hard at this point, and the progress is slow compared to the slate. Specimens of copper were found in this rock, and yesterday afternoon salt was reached at a depth of 874 feet, there being 700 feet of very strong brine in the well this morning. At 10 o'clock Saturday morning the connecting rod was broken, leaving the drill in the well 665 feet from the surface. At Higgins lake, Roscommon county. yesterday, Mrs. Charles H. Pettit and her little daughter, aged three years, were boating when the little one, while gleefully capering about, sprang into the water. The mother, in her anxiety and fright, then upset the boat, and as they were alone the chances were excellent for a double funeral. Indeed such would have been the case had not their horse, an intelligent French pony, which had been turned loose to graze on the shore of the lake, come to their rescue. Alarmed by the screams of the mother and by the commotion which the two made in the water the brave animal swam bedily out to them and when they had taken a secure hold of its mane struggled back to the shore, a tired but heroic pony. The animal is inclined to be balky and he never would pull anything but a light load, but it will be cold weather when he isn't a prime favorite after this.— Detroit News.

Anderson, the slayer of McGinnis, in Marquette, says he was drunk and doesn't know anything about it. If that plea of irresponsibility because he was drunk is ever worth anything -if there ever was a case in which a court would be justified in holding that besotted drunkenness takes away power of intent-this is just that case. The murderer had no quarrel with the murdered man. There was no cause or motive for the crime. If drunkenness is a legal excuse for assault and battery, or rape or any other crime—if it is any excuse for any offense whatever-then certainly it ought to cover murder. If it ought to save a man from a fine, or a few days in jail, it ought certainly to save from life imprisonment. This shows how lacking in common sense are those judges and jurors who regard drunkenness as any excuse for crime, or as any negative on the question of criminal intent. When a man gets drunk he intends all the consequences of his getting drank; hence being drunk is an aggravation of a crime, and not an excuse for it. This Anderson-McGinnis murder case puts the question vividly before the courts and the public. Now let us see what will be done about it.—Lansing Republican.

THIS afternoon, as Mr. Wm. Hathaway's separator started to cross the river from Niles township the first bent of the bridge gave way and fell into the river, carrying the separator with it. The team was drowned and the machine badly broken. The two men who were with the team escaped injury. As this accident happened on the Niles end of the bridge, we presume that township will be called upon to pay damages.

THERE will be but a short time before Dowagiac will have the best lot of | growth than this. The company mansidewalks of any small town in Michigan. The city builds all of the walks of cement, and as a consequence all are alike instead of being a change at every lot, as is the case in Buchanan, where each property owner builds his own walk in accordance with his own ideas, and we have as many different kinds of walk as we have inhabitants.

OAK RIDGE CEMETERY, which has heretofore always looked so clean and neat, is now in the poorest condition it has been since it was laid out as a cemetery. Weeds are allowed to grow and mature to cast their seeds broadcast, trees and shrubbery need trimming, and roads and lanes need repairing. The cemetery is self-sustaining from the sale of lots, and enough of the receipts ought to be expended to keep the grounds in good shape. The sexton says he is not to blame for the condition of the cemetery. Then who is to blame?

To the Citizens of Three Oaks and Vicinity.

We have made arrangements with Mr. Alvah Sherwood to look after the interest of the RECORD in Three Oaks and at the same time fully represent the interest of Three Oaks in the columns of the RECORD. Mr. Sherwood is well known among you and there can be no doubt that both interests will be well and fully cared for at his hands. Mr. Sherwood will have charge of the Three Oaks list of RECORD subscribers and be authorized to receive and receipt for monies paid on subscription account and to receive new names, and job work entrusted to him will receive prompt and careful attention, and done at as reasonable a rate as can be procured at any place. Any assistance rendered Mr. Sherwood in his work of news gathering, and other ways, will be duly appreciated by him and by the Publisher. Notices of public meetings, church notices, and of free entertainments he will receive for publication without charge. For all notices of meetings connected with any money making scheme he will collect a small fee. Trusting that the new arrangement may prove mutually profitable to your enterprising village, to Mr. Sherwood and to the RECORD, we shall do our best to merit such a result and respectfully solicit your aid and co-oporation to that end.

For all time past it has been a custom for people to go away to some larger town to trade, with the idea that they can do so much better than at home. For instance a lady living near here recently went to South Bend and bought a bill of dry goods. The few small items that she had studied upon before going she bought cheap for the clerk always finds out just what she expects to buy cheap before giving prices, but before she gets through she has bought some things on which she has forgotten the home price and among other things paid $4.50 for a shawl, the duplicate of which had been offered her in Buchanan for $3 but a few days before, and the probability is that other things cost her proportionally high. It is not natural to suppose that the merchant who has all heavy expenses is going to be able to sell cheaper than the one whose expenses are half as great.

We hear the present council highly complimented for the rigor with which it enforces its mandates. Redden Bros. erected a wooden building within what was supposed to be the fire limits. There was a little growling done, nothing more, except to discover that the fire limit ordinance is of no value, because no such thing as Block "O" A. C. Day's addition, as used in the discription, exists. It might be proper to state that no move has yet been made to so correct this fatal error that people may put up all the wooden buildings they want to. There was an order issued that all places of business should remain closed on Sunday. and with the exception of the trading done the next Sunday by the President this order was observed one whole Sun-

There are several new features in their mill which give it a superiority over others; among them their peculiar sail fastening, and the glass lined bearings, which combine to make the "Buchanan" the most durable mill yet produced. They are now making a large mill with double pit man for running a feed grinder for a large dairy farm in central Wisconsin, that will be a new and successful venture, the double pitman taking the place of the bevel gear commonly employed to secure a rotary motion for turning machinery, and preventing the wheel from creeping out of the wind when at work, as in the case of the bevel gear.

The trotting horse is a typical American production, A Nowhere does it attain such perfection as in the United States. In fact it may hardly be said to exist at all anywhere else. None of the great contests of horse speed in England, France or Germany are between trotters. In all those countries the runner has the preference, and all the famous pieces of horsellesh there have won the homage paid them under the saddle. But in the United States Flora Temple, Dexter, Mand S. and St. Julien, not to mention a host of lesser lights, divide the honors with the Bard, Troubadour and the other monarchs of the turf.

It is undoubtedly the prevalence of light wheeled vehicles in the United States that has given trotting so great a hold on Americans. It would be quite impossible to do any great road speeding in Eugland, because the Eng-lish have no light wagons and sulkies to speak of. And there is no question but the trotting matches in America are an evolution of the road speeding practiced by well to do farmers and country gentlemen on their way to town, the country fair, and sometimes, it must be confescal, to church,

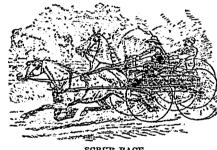

And, as many readers will testify, speed is not always to the light wagoned horse. Some-times the butcher boy with his heavy four wheeled cart will show the dust in right royal style to the gloved driver of the sleek thoroughbred harnessed to the spider skeleton or the natty road buggy.

WITH EUNNING MATE. The advocates of running may sneer at trotting matches, but it is only a question of taste as to which is the more exciting, and it is evident upon the face of it that trotting ssesses some advantages, not the least of which is the fact that a mile heat to sulky is of longer duration than under the saddle; and in certain sections of the country the people will have none of the latter. Those who have witnessed some of the historically speedy trotting matches understand their feeling, too. Nothing can well be more exciting than were the matches be-tween Mand S. and St. Julien in the days when it was still all uncertain as to which of them would prove the more speedy. , were the mate the little mare against time. The writer witnessed two of them, and in each instance she lowered her record. Just before the start on one occasion since grown famous the vast throng in the stands and on the ground began to grow still. When Baer wheeled up the stretch by the distance flags and started down to the wire there was a murmur of approval at the mare's perfect time. "Now!" was the mare's perfect time. "Now!" was the word given by 5,000 voices to the holders of stop watches as the beauty passed under the wire, and then all were breathless as she went down the turn, "Now!" was the chorus again as she passed the quarter, and then all was still again as the beautiful animal footed it alone "up the back" to the half mile post. The "now" swelled into α roar when she passed the second post, for everybody knew sho was doing unprecedented time. When the mare reached the third post the shout of "now" was frantic, but quickly subdued, and 20,000 pairs of eyes riveted themselves upon her glossy sides as she tore down the stretch, and when she passed under the wire the throng went mad. A few moments later she was decorated with flowers and garlands, and she seemed to appreciate the plaudits of the multitude as she was led up for inspection by the crowd. This was at Rochester, N. Y., and the time, better than 2:12, was long the pride of the Rochester track, and the mare's gilded effigy swing for years over the judges' stand sur-mounted by the magic figures showing the

The Business Side.

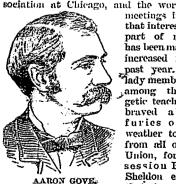

Some men are born with the poetic and others with the practical instinct. One of the latter class is a young man who has a business connection with an umbrella house on Broadway. He sailed for Europe a few days ago and on taking leave of him at the ship's side I suggested that he would have many opportunities for noble enjoyment abroad. I laid special stress on the listoric antiquities he would be likely to meet in England-how they would instruct and charm him and what a wearth of poetic and inspiring reminiscence he would store up for the benefit of his friends at home.

"Pooh, pooh!" he exclaimed, "I shan't see a thing in all Europe but umbrella handles;"

Aaron Gove, of California, and W. E. Sheldon, of Boston.

About 2,500 people were in attendance at the convention of the National Educational association at Chicago, and the work of the meetings indicated that interest on the part of members bas been materially increased in the past year. Many lady members were among the energetic teachers who braved all the furies of July weather to gather from all over the Union, for at one session President Sheldon estimated that there was an attendance of 1,600 fans. Some of the sessions were so crowded, indeed, that it was found necessary to hold overflow meetings. There is little doubt that the wonderful strength of the National Educational association has been largely brought about by the excellent management of its officers. Sheldon, who has been succeeded by Aaron Gove, of Colorado, leaves his position with an excellent record as an officer and educator.

A FOREIGN VIADUCT.

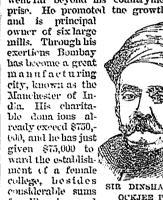

A Piece of French Engineering Worthy of Americans.

La Tardes is a river which through a valley to which it gives it name. It is crossed by the railroad which the Orleans company has established between Montlucon and Eygurande. A year ago a section of it was opened. The viaduct given in the engraving is in that section. It presents to the traveler a landscape nearly as rugged and wild as anything in the railroads of Mexico or Colorado. The vinduct is ninety-two meters above the river, on two piles of masonry, the one fiftynine meters, the other forty-eight, of elevation. The total length of the tabler is 251 meters. It is a piece of extraordinary daring in engineering, quite comparable to American achievements in that line, which are the most daring in the world. France regards it as a work which will give the greatest honor to the engineers who conceived and directed it, particularly as the difficulties overcome were exceptional. This railroad, at one point between Letrade and Giat, attains an altitude of 760 meters, and descends rapidly to 700 meters. It constitutes a direct route between Paris and Eygurande, and will be the shortest and most economical way between Paris and Mont Dore and Burboule

VIADUCT OVER THE LA TARDES. The Orleans company have reduced the time between these places, and have further "wagons lits toilette," otherwise sleeping cars. A "wagon restourant" dining car will be added, and tourists will travel with all the delights of voyagers in dreams.

A Philanthropic Parsec. The Parsees are the Yankees of India—the descendants of the noted thre worshipers of Persia, the race so noted in the annals of religious persecution and idolized by the genius of Tom Moore in "Lalla Rookh." The remnant driven into India became traders and manufacturers, and have slowly but steadily advanced to the first rank in that country. Progressive, orderly and industrious, they welcome the introduction of British arts and sciences, and many of them have attained to high rank in the British service, Sir Dinshard himself having been knighted. THE FIRST RAILROADS.

HOW THEY CARRIED PASSENGERS AND FREIGHT IN EARLY DAYS.

Cuts Showing the Styles of Locomotives and Cars that Were Used in France and England When the Ways for the Iron Horse Were First Opened.

The first railroad in France was built in 1823 between Saint Etienne and La Loire, but it carried only vehicles drawn by horses. It was not properly a railroad; it was only a tramway. The first locomotive drawing cars was put in operation in 1832 between Saint Etienne and Lyons, but it drew principally merchandise. Passengers were carried in a compartment attached to the freight cars.

FIRST CLASS. The inauguration of the first railroad in France which really aroused public interest and enthusiasm was the Saint Germain road in 1837. All the journals were filled with talk about railroads. The whole public were in an excitement over it. That was really the first railroad proper that was operated in France. The ceremonies of inauguration lasted three days. The queen, a duchesse and some dukes had the first day. Men of financial fame, men in charge of industrial interests, politicians and engineers had the second day for their own, while the third day was given over to the general public. On that day 18,000 passengers went over the road

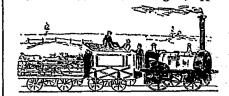

SECOND CLASS. The first railroad in England was built in 1767, but the first carrying a locomotive was from Darlington to Stockton in 1825; but not until the 15th of September, 1830, did England have a railroad which carried passen-gers as they carry them today, for there is but little difference in their transportation of first class passengers now and then. The car was divided into three compartments. Their baggage was put on the top of the car, after the manner of country staging. There are to this day certain lines of railroads in England where they do the same thing.

"GOODS" TRAIN. Second class passengers were put in an un covered apartment; and as for the third class. the steerage passengers of transatlantic ships are lodged in elegance in comparison with them. Freight trains were operated by the fewest possible men, and the employes in charge of cattle trains had no sinecure. The locomotives were tubular. They could streak it along at fifteen miles an hour, but for fear of accidents they held down the pace to twelve miles an hour on the opening days. The inventor of the locomotive wrote in a letter the following: "Not the least surprising thing about the day was the audacious temerity of the first who confided themselves to these terrible motors. But the influence of example is miraculous. That which an isolated man dare not do ten will readily do. Each carriage contains a certain number of companions, who give each other courage; and they forget that the least derangement of these powerful machines would be for all the signal of an inevitable and terrible death."

English railroad was not inaugurated without accident. A member of the house of commons descended to the station to chat with the Duke of Wellington, slipped

LIVE STOCK TRAIN. on the rails in crossing the track to re-enter his carriage and was run over by the locomotive of a train coming from behind. He died the same evening.

The African Missious. The friends of Bishop Taylor's African missions, which are not supported by any missionary society, have, in the past eighteen months, contributed nearly $45,000 to maintain them, besides supplying $24,000 to build the bishop's steel Congo steamer, which has cost $30,000. Many of the stations in Augola are now raising much of their food supplies, and are thus largely self supporting. Seven missionaries have died, but seventy remain in active service. This does not include the children, of whom a considerable number are with their parents. Bishop Taylor is supposed to have joined the last party that left this country in Liberia, and to be with them now on the Congo, which they will leave before long to travel bundreds of miles up the Kasfluent to the rich Baluba country.—New

An Unbeaten Racehorse. Hanover, the 3-year-old chestnut colt here pictured, is interesting all horse fanciers in New York and the east. His dam is Bourbon Belle and his sire Hindoo; and he has never yet been distanced. Last season as a 2-year-old he won four races, and early in July he had won twelve this season. At Sheepshead June 23, he ran the mile and a half in 2:4114, carrying 118 pounds, and at Monmouth Park.

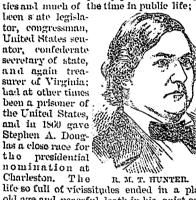

July 7, he ran the same distance, with the same weight, in 2:4014, winning his owner $13,000. July 2 he won the Spendthrift stakes, over Stockton and Reveller, making the mile and a quarter in 2:1114.

ROBERT M. T. HUNTER.

A Man Who Was a Figure in the Time The death of Hon. Robert Mercer Taliaferro Hunter, at his home in Essex county, Va., closes another chapter in the history of the dark and dread period of the war, and removes another of the very few remaining statesmen of the old time in the south. He had lived so long that the younger generation scarcely knew his name, but there was a time when the name of Hon, R. M. T. Hunter was a power in Virginia and the nation He had been nearly fifty years in active polities and much of the time in public life; had been s ate legisla-life so full of vicissitudes ended in a placid old age and peaceful death in his quiet country seat—a striking though mournful illustration of the great peace that has settled upon the land since the terrific struggles over slavery, war and reconstruction. Mr. Hunter was born in Essex county,

April 20, 1809-born a politician, one might say, as his voice was heard in local debate even before his majority, and he was a party leader as soon as he was a voter. Educated at the University of Virginia and the Winchester law school, he was admitted to the bar in 1830, and soon after served three years in the legislature. In 1837 he was elected to congress at the early age of 26; was re-elected in 1839 and 1841, defeated in 1843, again elected in 1845, and while serving that term chosen to the United States senate, which he entered in December, 1847, and never left tiil the war began, in 1861. In the Twentysixth congress he served as speaker at the early age of 39. Indeed, like Henry Clay, he presented one of those rare instances in which the mind attains the fullness of its powers very early, and yet retains them unimpaired to the last day of a long life. During the doubtful days of the early part of 1861, Mr. Hunter remained in the senate till its adjournment; the secession of Virginia followed two months after and he was formally expelle ! at the called session in July, as he had actively taken sides with the secoded states. He was a member of the Confederate congress and Confederate secretary of state; was one of the noted peace conference, meeting Lincoln and Seward at Hampton Roads, and after the collapse of the Confederacy was arrested by the Federal authorities, but soon released on parole. In 1867 he received a pardon from President Johnson and again entered public life, serving as state treasurer of Virginia. Thereafter he retired from service and soon closed his active and somewhat stormy life almost on the very spot where it began.

A Colored Hero. The hero of the hour in New York city is the colored man who saved seven lives, on the occasion of the capsizing of the sloop Mystery, in Canarsie bay, a week or two ago. Arthur Robinson, the rescuer, is a dark mulatto, of fine form, great strength and good health, 35 years old, and a native of Quire Creek, Va. When only 10 years old he ran away and went to sea, and has since lived chiefly on the water, having been for seven years past in the employ of Capt. Collins, of the Reaper. The Mystery was distant from his boat about

I see my wife at home; I see them strugglin' and screamin' in the water; I see myself and knows as all depends on me, an' I put my feet firm on the keel when I get among 'em, stooped down summat, reached over the gunnel (gunwale) carefully and has 'em in. * * * First come a little boy. Then a body, then Mr. Sweets-zer and his wife and child. I landed them and pulled for something I see moving in the wake of the Deaue." He had landed the first load on the Deane. He got a woman onto the Deane who was still alive, but died because there were no appliances for reviving those exhausted in the water. He saved two others, making seven in all. In taking up one very large woman, her weight rolled his boat over till it dipped a large quantity of water, and all had a narrow escape. Arthur is a pleasant and extremely modest man, and bears the honors heaped upon him very grace-

The French are getting ready for war. They are organizing sanitary trains for the removal and care of the wounded. Some of their journals say these trains are an absolute necessity, as the next war will show, in moving masses so formidable that the mightiest armies of the past would be as nothing compared with them. What are we to infer from that? A general wrangle all over Europe?

The Germans have a very complete sanitary service. The Russians also have their sanitary trains; and the Austrians, thanks to the Chevaliers de Malte, are also admirably provided in that respect. But so far France has only about a dozen sanitary trains, a francs. Since then the young lady seems to number quite insufficient, since it has been demonstrated by the fact that out of an army of 25,000 men one-fourth may be sick or wounded. Improvised sanitary trains are al-until his renuncration for every yarn was high up into the thousands. He did not ask these prices, but Mr. Bonner, finding his

A WESTERN COURT HOUSE.

The New and Beautiful Home of the Law at Columbus, O.

The new and beautiful court house at Columbus, O., is something of an exception to public buildings in general, in that it cost less than the original estimate. It was voted to erect a building to cost not more than $500,000:

the structure was completed ready for occupancy for $450,017.27. One can tell upon the ingers of one hand the public buildings in this country which cost less than the law

This court house (for Franklin county, O.,)

was recently formally opened by appropriate services, taking place in the central corridor. The body of the building is of gray stone, with appropriate carvings in the proper places, the columns flanking the doorways, those supporting the roof of the main portice

above being of red granite. The main cor ridor is open to the roof and lighted through delicately stained glass; around it the stairs

built of iron with woodwork in cherry, lead by easy ascent to the upper story, and from the court rooms on the second floor interior stairs lead directly to the jury rooms and rooms for witnesses. In the upper story are large rooms for old documents, sufficient to store all of them for many years. Columbus will now rank with the largest cities in the elegance and convenience of its court house and this building will rather "take the shine out of" the Ohio state house, which is of a style of architecture for which no one ha:

found a good name, but which is aptly com-

THE SANITARY TRAIN. war and the railroad companies are now engaged in considering the question of saniary trains. Already on one line a regular sani tary train has been put. It carries physicians, pharmacists, officers of administration engineers of the railroad company, members of the society for aid to the wounded, which is composed of women, nurses, e'c.

The train is composed of twenty-three carringes, disposed in this order: A van for fuel, one for linen, one for medicine and officers of administration; seven ambulances; a car for the nurses, one for the cuisine one for the pharmacist; and surgeons and one for the provisions. All the cars, from one end of the train to the other, communicate by a central corridor, which permits the doctors and surgeons and others to have ready access to whatever department requires their services. During the transit from Paris to Havro twenty-seven nurses gave their care to eighty-eight pseudo

The management of this train has cost the state 60,000 francs, and has reflected great honor on the two engineers who furnished the plans. The smallest bit of space has been utilized; each car contains eight beds arranged in the fashion of the berths at sea. On the left of each couch is a little board or shelf to hold the cup, glass and other immediate trifles for giving medicine or drink. The furniture of the car consists of a brush, a broom, a coal scuttle and slop pail. They are ventilated by an ingenious system of openings at the bottom of the car or wagon. In the evening the cars are lighted by four lanterns. The arms and clothing of the soldiers are put in wire nets in the space be tween the beds. A stove of the most manage able variety will heat the car in winter. A linen bag at the head of each bed receives the papers establishing the identity of the sick or wounded occupant of the bed. On each bead is a hospital cloak, a shirt, a pair of trousers and a pair of stockings.

The cuisine car contains a large stove with boiler of hot water, two ovens, kitchen utensils, tables, etc. The cooks are clothed in white linen trousers and blue linen blouses. A coffee mill is fastened to the wall, a cu board contains the bottles and glasses, and a tube running near conveys the water from in outside reservoir, and a drain against the wall of the car carries away the waste.

DOCTOR'S CAR. The car of the pharmacist is also admirably arranged. To the four walls of the car a set of pigeon holes are arranged to carry the bottles without danger of breakage. Boxes containing the surgeon's implements are also ready at hand, and everything bearing the label of what it contains.

The sanitary train is indeed a veritable moving hospital, sufficient unto itself for any emergency. Then, when necessary, ordinary trains will follow the sanitary, bearing merchandise and even the wounded.
