A NEW FASHIONED GIRL.

She'd a great and varied knowledge, picked up at a female college, of quadratics, hydrostatics, and pneumatics, very vast; She was stuffed with erudition as you stuff a leather cushion, all theologies of the colleges, and the knowledges of the past. She had studied the old textbooks of Pevorian and Mexican, their theology, anthropology, and geology, o'er and o'er; She knew the forms and features of the prohibitive creatures; ichthyosaurs, plesiosaurs, megalosaurs, and many more. She'd describe the ancient Tuscans and the Basques and the Etruscans, their griddens, their kettles, and the victims that they gnawed; She'd discuss the learned charmer, the theology of Brahma, and the scandals of the Vandals and the sandals that they trod. She knew all the mighty giants and the master minds of science; all the learning that was turning in the burning brain of man; But she couldn't prepare a dinner for a gaunt and hungry slaver, nor get up a decent supper for her poor, wretched papa, for she never was constructed on the old domestic plan.

JOE'S WIFE.

Doctor Ford was driving home in the twilight after a hard day's work, tired, and anxious as to the result of an important surgical operation performed that morning. The mud splattered up from the streets as he rolled along, and the chilling November drizzle gave to the familiar trees a forlorn, almost ghastly aspect. His heart warmed as he pictured to himself his wife watching for him with a welcoming smile in the cosy parlor, dinner ready, and a long, restful evening before them. But as he drew near home, no cheerful light streamed from door or window. All seemed as if the house were empty, the dripping street. He threw the reins to the boy whose duty it was to hold the horse on his professional rounds and flung open the front door with a sudden, angry, and somewhat ungentle voice; no tender smile; no sympathetic voice; no freighting; no dinner, apparently.

"Elinor!" he called. No answer. "Elinor!" he called again. This time a voice spoke out of the darkness—a tired voice. "Do be more quiet, John; the baby is just going to sleep."

"When at last the baby slept before this time of night?" "He has been fretful all day with his teeth, and I have not had a chance to change his teeth."

A wailing cry from the nursery sent the doctor, with some inaudible words, proceeded to light the gas and take off his coat and overcoat. The nursery door was ajar, and the parlor had evidently been arranged by fibernarian hands; an odor of some burning stoves in from the kitchen. A pleasant reception for a man after a long day's work.

He ran upstairs with no gentle footstep. His wife sat by the nursery fire; her face wore a weary expression, and she had on the same blue gown which she had donned for breakfast. The baby lay at her arms. She held up a warning finger as her husband came blundering in, but already baby's light slumber had been disturbed, and the process of soothing and silencing had to be repeated for the fifth time.

It seemed to the young mother as if her patience could hold out no longer. It was provoking to have the little one started from his sleep, and to have her husband, who had been trying to get down stairs to make the house pleasant with a magpie touch here and there. She jumped to her feet, and went to the nursery, and there, in a few moments, she had her husband by the hair, and there he was no time for her to do one of these things. Nurse was away with a sick sister, and babies always demanded more from their mothers than from any one else. "My mother always had a way to seize every opportunity to prove their power over the anxious, half ignorant young mothers who are happy, after all, to be their slaves."

"Mrs. Ford laid the baby in his crib, sound asleep this time, warm and lovely in his utter repose. She gave a hurried dab at her weary hair, caught up a handkerchief, and sat at the table with a decidedly cross look on his face. He barely tasted the soup, then pushed it away in disgust.

"I'm tired," said his wife. "Of course. Can't you smell it all over the house? Why don't you look after Bridget a little?"

"Why, John, I have hardly been down stairs since I got up this morning. Where's Hannah?"

"She went to her sister's last night. Oh, yes, I forgot. What's this? Cold or beef? Really, Elinor, have you nothing else to offer?"

"No. What then?"

"A beefsteak, if there is one to it." Mrs. Ford rose and went to the kitchen. The beefsteak had just filled up the range with fresh coal, so there was nothing to be done but make the best of the cold meat, potatoes and macaroni, followed by a desert of apple pudding and cheese.

Doctor Ford found fault with the potatoes and said he was tired of macaroni, the bread was dry, the butter not perfect. As to the pudding:

"My mother always had mince pies at this season," said he.

"It is a pity you ever left your mother," said she, bitterly.

"I think so, too," he responded, pushing his chair back. "She would have run around the table and whistled to her husband's shoulder, or to rush up-stairs and have a good cry by baby's side. She decided upon the latter course, and with quivering lip, left the room and shut herself up in the nursery, where the fire was dying, and on the hearth and the baby breathing softly. In contrast to her overwrought condition.

"Well, it is provoking. Women all ways must cry and fly into a passion about trifles."

But her husband, even as he thought these words, began to feel repentant. He remembered the teething baby, and the long day at home alone. In another moment he would have followed his wife upstairs and apologized for the pain he had given her. But the door bell rang, and a summons to visit a sick man at a distance sent him at once out into the wet night. And all domestic grievances were forgotten before he had driven two hundred yards from the town by the river. The darkness seemed deeper in this poor neighborhood, the rain more soaking, and the wind keener. The river swept noisily by, a black, swollen tide, reflecting the flaring lights on the bridge. But the doctor minded this discomfort very little. He was in love with his wife, and he was in love with the despised dinner had given him new courage to fight pain and death.

He entered the one room of the low

When the Sun Gives Out.

Sir Robert Ball, who is one of the foremost astronomers in Great Britain, speaking from scientific knowledge, places these days when the sun gives out of expression. Her thin hair hung over her neck, her calico dress fell limply from her sharp shoulders. She started at the doctor as he entered and could not see there were tears in her child-like eyes. "Joe's sick," she said slowly, still gazing into his face. "What's the matter?" "He's so 'ter die, maybe," she faltered piteously. "Oh, I hope not." "Joe's sick," she repeated in a whisper, shaking her head. "Who's come?" asked a voice from the bed in a corner of the room. "Nellie, girl, who are ye talkin' with?" It is Doctor Ford, whom you sent for to see the patient, approaching the bed. One candle lighted dimly the untidy, comfortable place, showing a stove and a man with tumbled hair and rough beard lying among the pillows of his bed. "Oh, the doctor!" he said with feverish eyes staring from under shaggy brows. "How long have you been ill?" asked Doctor Ford, sitting down on a rickety chair. "It's a week since I give up, but I've been feeling bad a long time."

The doctor placed his little thermometer in the patient's tongue and waited silently. "Joe's sick," moaned the girl, peering out of the shadows. The sufferer seemed to be irritated by the doctor's presence, and he made an impatient gesture, but as he did so glanced pitifully at the slouching figure. "What you most need is good nursing," said the doctor, after examining the patient. The man's face darkened. The woman hovered aimlessly over the stove. "She's my wife," said the sick man, hoarsely. "I know she ain't quite like other folks. But she's peaceable and good, not hold and noisy like other women. I pitied her first off, then I got mad at her. And she's a good girl. The girl that I married, she stood there with her vacant, troubled face, fumbling with the pillows. "What you most need is good nursing," said the doctor, after examining the patient. A BUCHANAN township farmer, who noted things, gives as his opinion that the cold wet weather of April and May has been quite destructive on insect life, and consequently beneficial to crops. He says that where growing wheat was last fall filled with Hessian fly and in a fair way to be destroyed, now show no evil effects of this fly, the young insects having hatched out and perished in the cold storms. Those who have been growling about the bad weather may find consolation in this statement, that there may be some good derived from it.
