TWO MOURNERS.

There could no longer be any reasonable doubt. Poor Jack Lester had been drowned in the wreck of the Ootacamund, and Celia Grey was the most unhappy girl in Woodbury. She was forced to keep her grief to herself because she had not been officially engaged to Jack. She thought it might have been a little easier to bear if her friends had known how unhappy she was, and with what a broken heart she was carrying her secret sorrow. With this great secret sorrow in her heart the ordinary routine of life grew painful. She had not spirit for tennis parties, she shied her gay summer frocks, she would not act as bridesmaid to her cousin Susie. She used to lie awake at night, and think about Jack, and wonder how long he had been dead.

However, Celia went to her cousin's wedding, and spent three days away from Woodbury. The news of the wreck was a faint light and forgotten by people who came back. She arrived by a morning train, sent her trunk to Beedmore House with a porter and walked back through the streets. She was not alone when she wished to do some shopping. As she went into the stationer's she saw Fannie Potter there, a girl she knew and disliked. She was surprised, but she would have escaped from the shop rather than speak to Fannie, but she was recognized at once.

"What a young girl you have to be!" said Fannie Potter, putting down a pack of black edged envelopes and coming forward. For a short time some years ago the two girls had been close friends. Fannie had gone to school, and on the strength of this Fannie continued to address Celia by her Christian name. She did not often get the chance of doing this. The Potters were not people with whom the Greys were wont to associate. Mr. Potter was an attorney of doubtful repute. It was well known that on Fannie's behalf he had threatened a well-to-do farmer with a breach of promise case, and that the young man had only got by paying a substantial sum. Since that time Fannie had dressed more fashionably than ever, but she had not been asked for her hand since again.

Celia thought that she wanted and was about to leave the shop when Fannie looked at her and said that they might as well walk a little together. She was going past Beedmore.

Celia had no excuse on the tip of her tongue, so she did as she was asked, although she rather objected to her presence in Miss Potter's society. The two young women walked through the town together and were soon in a quiet country road. It was very hot morning.

"You must find that gown rather heavy," said Celia, who saw that her companion was mourning deep enough for a young widow.

"My heart is very heavy," said Fannie, with an unaccounted sigh.

"I did not know you were in trouble," she said.

"It was rather difficult to be more than a girl, because Fannie showed her grief in such an objectionable way. She had not a word to say to me, but she was so broad and bold and was sobbing into it so loudly that any they passed started after them."

"No," said Celia. "What is the matter?"

"I thought every one knew. I am staying with Mrs. Lester. That is why I have to pass Beedmore."

FACED

CULTIVATION OF ORCHARDS.

Directions by an Expert—How to Cultivate Close to Low Top.

The best time is that which begins early in the season, and which keeps the surface stirred until late summer. The first few years turn the land rather deep with a plow at the first spring cultivation. In general, level culture is best. This is secured by plowing one year to the trees and the following year away from them, one year north and south and the next year east and west. It is somewhat difficult to plow from large trees, however, and with the cultivators or harrows now in use it is easy to work the soil away by subsequent cultivation, allowing the furrow to be thrown toward the tree each spring, but it is always advisable, upon spring level culture, to take the furrow in opposite directions in alternate years.

to be raised and hooked to the floor timbers of the house. The warm air of the cellar, being allowed to enter the enclosed frame outside, keeps any sudden chill in the atmosphere, either at night or on cloudy days, particularly where the cellar contains a furnace or other heating apparatus. Of course such an arrangement does not in any way interfere with the ventilation of the house, as the object is to keep the air in the cellar, and not to keep it in the house.

Country Gentleman suggests some forms of timber supports, one of which is represented in the first figure shown in the accompanying cut. The timber post supports not only the center of the

When ducks have been properly cared for, they will lay nearly as many eggs as chickens. The eggs from ducks being nearly double the price of hens' eggs in some markets, and as the duck will lay from 100 to 140 eggs she is a very valuable fowl. In feeding ducks do not give them any kind of grain, but give them other foods. Cooked turkeys, with a small quantity of ground meat added and enough ground oats and cornmeal to make the mess palatable, will make a cheap meal and answer all purposes, but if they are laying well they should be fed three times a day, beginning early in the morning. They must have animal food in some form, or they will lay well. Weak legs indicate not only that the ducks are overfed, but that the quarters are damp; they will sometimes get the rheumatism. It is best to allow them to run out for exercise when it can be done, and their quarters should be clean, with plenty of cut straw on the floor.

There are several things necessary to get winter eggs: First of all, pullets, or young hens; second, green food of some kind; third, animal food of some kind, such as beef scraps, animal meal or cut bone and fat; fourth, exercise in some form to make them lay. Scatter straw, cornstalks or sawdust in the scratching pen and throw your grain in it. This will induce the flock to exert themselves and will aid wonderfully in shelling out the best of their eggs.

It is to be remembered that the hen will lay warm quarters, but she will not lay in a sunny, southern slope and warm house, properly ventilated, of course. Poultry are more profitable and healthy when they have open sheds facing south or west and the sunbath can doors are kept open. The birds should be kept dry for the hens to work in than where they are shut up in houses lacking circulation of air and having only small glass windows. Changing water in the troughs, and having clean and fresh water troughs, are most important when storms prevail. Barnyard fowls are not delicate, as a rule, unless too closely confined, as is explained in The Farm Journal. Hens that are out of doors get very little disease, and as their owner could not provide in a glass house. There is an unalterable law that the more we can get cows and hens to eat without getting too fat the greater will be our receipts.

Warm houses, green food, animal meal or a proper amount of meat, early hatched pullets, or young hens, and plenty of exercise. By following these directions farmers and others will not want for winter eggs.

Professor J. H. Sheppard is credited with saying:

From all published data I should be inclined to believe that the best winter egg is the one that is laid by a hen that has been fed on a diet of corn, wheat and clover. The value of wheat as a feed can be learned only by comparing its price with that of other grains. If barley, corn and shorts are cheap enough to produce 100 pounds of pork at a less cost than wheat, it is fully worth the feed. However, with wheat at its present low price and other grains high, it will in very many cases pay to feed the wheat, and especially that which is "off" in grade. The value at present of wheat is about 10 cents per bushel, and the value of other feeds should determine which to use.

Whippoorwill Cowspeas. Oklahoma has a report of the analyses of whippoorwill cowpeas at five different stages and of prairie grass, "composed almost wholly of blue stem and joint grass," at three different cuttings. With reference to the cowpeas, results indicate that for a good hay the peas, including vines, leaves and pods, should be harvested as soon as the peas have matured in the pods. Should the crop be late it is better to cut before complete maturity than to delay the harvesting until a heavy frost has killed the vines and leaves.

A UNIQUE DESIGN.

Diversified as are the features of our country in climate, soil, surface and position, no one style of rural architecture is properly adapted to the whole, and it is a gratifying incident to the intelligence in a variety of tastes that we possess the opportunity which we desire in its display to almost any section in mode and effect. The Swiss chalet may hang in the mountain pass; the polished Gothic may shoot up among the evergreens of the rugged hills; the Italian roof, with its overhanging eaves, may command the wooded slope or the open plain, or the quaint and shadowy style of the old English manor, composed in its vines and shrubbery, may nestle in the quiet, shaded valley, all suited to their respective positions and in harmony with the natural features by which it is enclosed. Nor does the effect which such structures give to the landscape in an ornamental point of view require that they be more imposing in character than the necessities of the occasion may demand. True economy demands a structure sufficiently spacious to accommodate its occupants in the best manner, but it does not mean that the occupant is to be cramped and comfort are concerned in a dwelling, and its conformity to just rules in architecture need not be additionally expensive or troublesome.

As a result of many experiments with feeding laying hens, authorities seem to agree that a ration containing about twice as much of the fat formers as of muscle makers gives best results. The difficulty is that some hens in the flock lay more than others, and their individual characteristics interfere with the application of fixed rules. For fattening hens the ration should be about six times as much fat formers as muscle makers. The fact that the food of laying hens is not only a variety of animal, vegetable and mineral—renders it impossible to formulate a table of foods. As long as they are fed together, instead of separately, the nonlaying hen will receive the same food as the producing hen, and this is a variety of fatness, instead of appropriating the food to eggs; hence, owing to these individual peculiarities, the balanced ration is fixed at one to two, which approaches very nearly the composition of the egg. This is diversified, and the capacity of different individuals is found in herds of cows as well as in flocks of hens. As Rural New Yorker says, it is quite likely that two cows standing side by side in the same barn might, with great accuracy, be taken for one, but it does not follow that the average would be great enough to pay for the labor and time spent in mix and feed special jobs.

Wide tires are imperative on the good roads of France. They not only make important upon our soft dirt roads.

There are several things necessary to get winter eggs: First of all, pullets, or young hens; second, green food of some kind; third, animal food of some kind, such as beef scraps, animal meal or cut bone and fat; fourth, exercise in some form to make them lay. Scatter straw, cornstalks or sawdust in the scratching pen and throw your grain in it. This will induce the flock to exert themselves and will aid wonderfully in shelling out the best of their eggs.

It is to be remembered that the hen will lay warm quarters, but she will not lay in a sunny, southern slope and warm house, properly ventilated, of course. Poultry are more profitable and healthy when they have open sheds facing south or west and the sunbath can doors are kept open. The birds should be kept dry for the hens to work in than where they are shut up in houses lacking circulation of air and having only small glass windows. Changing water in the troughs, and having clean and fresh water troughs, are most important when storms prevail. Barnyard fowls are not delicate, as a rule, unless too closely confined, as is explained in The Farm Journal. Hens that are out of doors get very little disease, and as their owner could not provide in a glass house. There is an unalterable law that the more we can get cows and hens to eat without getting too fat the greater will be our receipts.

Warm houses, green food, animal meal or a proper amount of meat, early hatched pullets, or young hens, and plenty of exercise. By following these directions farmers and others will not want for winter eggs.

CONTEMPT WORSE THAN CRIME.

An Australian Judge and How He Maintained the Dignity of His Court.

The stories of early Australian judges are numerous and incredible. The following incident which is vouched for as a fact, is of a judge who had a very lofty idea of his own legal respect and was, at the same time, anxious to sustain the dignity of his court. A "shooting case" came before him. There was no direct evidence as to the perpetrator of the murder, but the individual arrested was well known and indeed confessed the deed.

When brought into court, the judge cautioned the prisoner that he would reserve his rights as a free citizen, and that, above all things, he must not interrupt the proceedings of the court. After this friendly warning the judge proceeded to state that he (the prisoner) was accused of having on such a date shot the deceased. Upon this the prisoner broke in: "Well, and so I did."

The judge was annoyed at the interruption. "Hold your tongue, sir!" he exclaimed. "Have I not told you that I will reserve myself to interrupt you if you do so again?" he asked sternly.

He then repeated the accusation, upon which the prisoner broke in: "I have told you before that I killed!" The judge's indignation was intense at this second interruption, and he demanded, "Mr. Sheriff, what is your evidence?"

"I have nothing but circumstantial evidence, your honor, and the prisoner's own confession."

"Then," said the judge, "I discharge the prisoner on this accusation, but commit him to the custody of the sheriff for contempt of court."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

"Now, I confess, this surprised me. I had always been taught to believe just the reverse, and it took years of listening and peeps before I would believe my senses. But the truth was before me—the boys talking girls, girls, girls, and the girls talking studies, studies, studies."—Kansas City Star.
