THE LIBRARY MOVEMENT

The increased interest in the Buchanan Library over the past year and a half seems to be only a reflection of a nation-wide impulse in that direction, reflected in national and state measures and also in myriad individual movements. The Buchanan project is only one of many in southwestern Michigan. Among the new projects getting under way is the promotion of a library by the women's clubs of New Buffalo, and promotions of new or revivals of old libraries at Lakeside, Hartford, Coloma, Watervliet, Lawson, Decatur, Chelsea. The Kellogg Foundation of Battle Creek, which was started in 1930 and has rapidly grown to be one of the great philanthropic foundations of the United States, has taken a hand in the library movement, and is circulating large numbers of children's books in the seven southwestern Michigan counties (why isn't Buchanan included?) in which the Foundation works.

Buchanan has the unenviable distinction of being one of the very few towns of its size in Michigan that does not have a fully equipped library, built up gradually over a long period of years. Bringing the institution up to standard is a problem which the city will eventually have to face. Rather unusual financial problems distracted the attention of the city administration this year and there is no criticism of appropriations for library benefit. Eventually, however, the city will have to answer the question why Buchanan is paying less than a third per capita on library support in comparison with the average city in Michigan. This is dramatically illustrated by the cases of Niles and Berrien Springs. Niles is not over three times the size of Buchanan but appropriates 11 times as much to the library. Berrien Springs is about one third the size of Buchanan but appropriates a half more to its public library. Yet both these institutions receive more income from fixed sources outside city taxation than does Buchanan. Neither Niles nor Berrien Springs are outstanding examples, such as Kalamazoo, which gives its library between ten and twelve times as much in proportion to size as Buchanan, whether based on population or assessment.

Buchanan really so much more poverty stricken than other communities? Does it have a monopoly on financial problems?

Boysenberries Are Grown in Berrien Co.

The first boysenberries to be grown in Berrien county are ripening now, and are attracting the attention of fruit men, some of whom predict a large future for them within a few years, when plants become generally distributed among farmers.

The boysenberries were developed in California in 1934, by crossing the loganberry, the raspberry and the dewberry. They have much the appearance of an enlarged dewberry, a measure from one and one-half inches to two inches long, by three-fourths inch to an inch in diameter. Their taste is entirely new.

Stephen A. Malata, Chicago attorney who has a country home on North Shore drive some three miles north of Benton Harbor, brought the first boysenberry plants to Michigan about two years ago. Horticulture is his hobby, and he was curious to know whether this new California fruit would grow in Michigan. He has decided that climatic conditions are favorable.

Helping a Community to "Pool" Its Resources

If a bank merely loaned or invested the capital contributed by its stockholders it would be only about 10% useful to its community.

A much larger circulating fund is necessary for loans and to carry on the other business of the community. So banks are organized to gather into one convenient place the small savings of people who have more money than they need immediately—and the bank's capital is pledged for their protection.

The great service rendered by the bank lies in safeguarding and circulating community funds for community good.

HOLLYWOOD BURNS AND ALLEN HEAD LAUGH CAST Gracie Allen, George Burns and Martha Raye, who panicked audiences in "College Holiday," head the all-star cast of the new Paramount musical comedy, "College Swing," which will open Friday at the Hollywood. In this story of a collegiate nitwit who takes over a leading American university and runs it to suit herself, the three gay clowns are assisted in their antics by Bob Hope, who climbed into the top drawer of stardom by virtue of his single performance as the master of ceremonies in the recent "Big Broadcast of 1938."

The story of "College Swing" is the high-garbed fantasy which has always provided Burns and Allen with their most successful material. It opens in Puritan times with a wealthy old New Englander making a will bequeathing the college he has founded to the first female member of his family who passes an examination in it. The camera then slides on down two centuries and shows Gracie, his descendant, getting herself in shape for the big test.

With the aid of a resourceful young student, Bob Hope, Gracie discovers a short-cut to knowledge which would make Einstein look like a piker. She passes the examinations with flying colors and takes control of the university immediately. Under Gracie's regime, an educational revolution takes place. "Liberal education" is made "liberal" in every sense of the word, with Gracie as "Dean of Men," Martha Raye as a member of the faculty and Hope as "Professor of Applied Romance." He "applies" it to, of all people, Martha, thus forming the screen's newest love team.

RANGELAND TRO COMES TO TOWN IN NEW THRILLER Action entertainment de-luxe is "The Purple Vigilantes," Republic western starring those plainsman pals, The Three Mesquiteers, showing at the Hollywood Theatre Friday and Saturday.

The story deals with the Mesquiteers' efforts to clean up the wild town of Towns End. A gang of outlaws steals the purple robes and masks of the original Vigilantes, who fought for law and order. The outlaws begin outrageous raids, and citizens believe the original Vigilantes are the marauders.

Into action swing the Mesquiteers; fists fly, and excitement runs high as the trigger trio bring justice into Trails End. George Sherman directed this rapid-fire thriller. "The Purple Vigilantes" is a healthy dish for all red-blooded lovers of action and adventure.

The newer methods of dealing with juvenile offenders—designed to prevent their developing into adult criminals—are effectively contrasted with the old by basing the story on the determined fight made by an idealistic young official to introduce his ideas into a reformatory of the old type.

SIX GIRLS IN THE CITY All that is Broadway is not gay nor glittery. Behind the shimmer and sheen of the spotlight are the curtains on the private lives of the gorgeous girls who amuse, beguile and entertain the millions of the great metropolis.

"Walking Down Broadway," the excellent 20th Century-Fox production directed by Norman Foster, which plays at the Hollywood Theatre Wednesday and Thursday, July 27-28, takes us "back stage" to view the heart-catching story of six girls... in a picture as brightly exciting as Broadway itself.

"Walking down Broadway" opens on a New Year's Eve with a big musical production ending its successful run. Almost immediately the film is teamed with drama as six members of the cast sign a pact to meet again at the end of a year—no matter what their careers may bring.

Tight-Wadding It Through Europe

CHAPTER 46
By HAWES

It must have been about July 27, 1937, that I was privileged to take a daylight trip through Germany—and also back through the centuries.

If I were to pick a half dozen "high spots" of the trip, certainly they would include that day long glimpse of the magnificent German countryside in harvest time. Less like a series of scenes of real life, more like a mighty panorama of pictures it lingers in my mind. That day I saw the finest farming I have ever seen, cultivated by methods that have not been used in this section of America for 75 years. There I witnessed the only real peasantry in costumes and in manner of life and of work that I saw in Europe.

The first impression as we left the crowded environs of Berlin was of the intense cultivation of every available yard of space. All along the line there were great mazes of switchyards, which I understand are a part of the military system of transportation. But instead of a wilderness of dirt and cinders, these switchyards were closely gardened in the angles between the tracks. Out along the main lines the grades pitched down steeply and were farmed closely to the very foot. As we rattled through towns and cities, every vacant lot was cultivated.

Perhaps the intense cultivation and toll that I witnessed that day was mostly voluntary but it hardly seemed likely. Men, women and children were laboring virtually in armies, as though under a military discipline. The old system is there prevalent in which the farming population lives in villages. I was most fortunate to see the country in the height of the harvest. All day we passed through scenes of intense labor. Late in the evening I saw occasional bands of men, women and children, trooping in bands back to their homes in the villages. These homes were admirable, for the most part of red brick with red or brown tile roofs, apparently large, well-built, comfortable. They were far better than the average American home. But it hardly seemed that there was much leisure to enjoy them at this time of the year at least.

scenes. But it seemed that not only was I traveling along through space on the Berlin-Paris train but that I was traveling back through the years and the centuries, as Mark Twain's Connecticut Yankee went back to King Arthur's court, or Walt Disney's creations take their fanciful trips of a Sunday evening through the Magic Mirror back to Ali Baba or the Forty-Niners.

The Hanoverian countryside had a somber richness and an indescribable loveliness that made me long to get off the train and take my way through it slowly. It was a combination of infinite detail in the intensely cultivated foreground, combined with great swings and sweeps of scenery. Through a part of the route I remember a range of mountains off to the north, jutting perpendicularly out of a cultivated plain. We passed a great gap like a gateway through these hills and in the gap was an immense statue, as though a memorial to some great historical personage or event.

There were the throngs of peasant, the women in flowing colorful costumes, toiling with scythes, shovels, mattocks; binding grain by hand with withes of straw; gleaners a la Millet; men driving carts drawn by single oxen or plowing, sometimes with horses but as often with oxen. There was that funeral procession I saw winding along on foot from a little village to a visible cemetery. It was about a quarter of a mile away but the nature of the scene was apparent. It seemed that they marched in some sort of order and that standards with some sort of symbols were carried in front of the procession, part of whom were robed. There were the solemn storks that I saw standing solemnly, always alone, often on one leg, in the pastures and low places. There were the old men I saw herding flocks of geese.

An hour or so out of Berlin and I became conscious with a jerk that there was something I was very used to lacking in the passing scene. What was it? Then it came to me—no cars. Literally no cars at all. In fact everyone was toiling in the fields, except a very few. Once in while a woman trudging along a country road, perhaps carrying or leading a child. A few carts. Once in a great while a bicyclist. But never a car on a rural road from Berlin at 10:57 a. m. to Aachen at 8 p. m. Only a few cars on the streets in towns and cities. No doubt there are through motor roads in Germany where more or less traffic may be seen but never along the Berlin-Paris line, at least on my side of the train. I remember one old lady, seemingly of very advanced age, trudging slowly along a lane, dressed all in great swathes of flowing black which, it seemed, must almost impede her steps, carrying in her arms a sheaf of grain which she had perhaps been permitted to glean in the fields for a few fowls. It seems typical of the intense toil, of the apparent life struggle that was visible from the train.

It seemed most likely, as my mother quoted a talk by Edward Steiner of Grinnell college in a recent letter from Boulder, Colo., there must be millions there who would crawl to America if they had the chance.

I had gone by train through the Norwegian and Swedish countryside, the farming people along the road had stopped and stood at ease as the train went by, laughing and waving their hands, until it almost seemed that they were some sort of Presidential train in triumphal procession, with the countryside cheering us on. It is part of the Scandinavian credo that "it is joyful to travel," reminiscent of Stevenson's saying that "it is better to travel hopefully than to arrive." Anyway they seem to sense your pleasure and share it as the train went by. But none of that in Germany. They bent intently to the task at hand, and I saw only two, a woman and a girl working apart in a potato field, who waved at the train among all the thousands that I passed.

A land of beauty and tragedy it seemed and it is not pertinent here to inquire into the responsibility for the tragedy. But it certainly did not rest with any single one of the toilers who labored in the literal truth of Markham's phrase, "Bowed with the weight of centuries."

One picture that sticks in my head will give an idea of the type of farm work there. In one field three or four men were mowing wheat with scythes. Just outside of them in the stubble several women bound the grain after them, using withes of straw, such as I often made when a boy when the binder missed a bundle. Then outside of these binders, were three women, stooping over gleaming chancé straws which they put in sacks, hung from their necks and pouched loosely in front of them as they stooped over. All these women wore the peasant costumes—some sort of large coarse shoes, long black skirts, and colored blouses and head clothes. Almost a "ringer" it seemed, for Millet's "The Gleaners." Then following or rather outside of the gleaners a few yards in the mowed field was a man with a cart drawn by a white ox, and loaded with some sort of gray substance, apparently a mineral fertilizer, which he was spreading in the stubble. I should say here that the women carried the bundles of grain and made large shocks, almost like young wheat stacks, in order to clear as much of the ground as possible for closely behind the reapers and the gleaners, in the same fields, followed the fertilizer carts and the plows. That was typical of the farming methods, so methodical, so ordered, that it almost seemed that the control must be military.

In fact in one field I saw a number of women and girls binding and gleaning, while a man in some sort of official costume or uniform was standing idly watching them, either in charge or an inspector of some sort. I remember that the golden grain stood higher than the women's heads.

Production was in fact tremendous. I was reared in northern Colorado, where general farming is intense. There I had often seen fields of grain yielding from 50 to 75 bushels per acre and even more. But to appearances the best of northern Colorado was no better than the average of Germany. The strip system was much in use, the fields consisting of strips perhaps 150 feet wide and quite long, with a variety of crops in succession—a strip of potatoes, then of beets, then of hay or some other crop. Potatoes were being dug by hand.

There were a few binders in the grain fields, but unlike American makes, they had reels of about four slats as compared with about six or more slats in an American binder reel. Also threshing was in progress. They had large threshing machines, unlike any I have ever seen here, and a universal feature was a baling attachment, so the straw came out in bales instead of being blown on a stack. It was hauled immediately from the machine to great sheds. No straw was left on the ground unsheltered even in bales. Strangely to me, there were more women working about the threshing machines than men.

I understand that there is now in effect in Germany a four-year plan designed to increase German farm production for both food and chemical purposes, and that the provisions of this plan make it criminal not only to leave ground vacant but to neglect cultivation or to produce less than the maximum. If true, this would explain the intensity of culture and toil. It seemed strange to an American—this jealous conservation of every square yard, almost every square foot. I remember fronting the track in our progress through one town as a backyard that had been converted into a miniature wheat-field and was graced with a wheat shock that seemed to cover a good part of its area. Nothing was overlooked to make Germany self-sufficient.

The newer methods of dealing with juvenile offenders—designed to prevent their developing into adult criminals—are effectively contrasted with the old by basing the story on the determined fight made by an idealistic young official to introduce his ideas into a reformatory of the old type.

SIX GIRLS IN THE CITY. All that is Broadway is not gay nor glittery. Behind the shimmer and sheen of the spotlight are the curtains on the private lives of the gorgeous girls who amuse, beguile and entertain the millions of the great metropolises.

And "Walking Down Broadway," the excellent 20th Century-Fox production directed by Norman Foster, which plays at the Hollywood Theatre Wednesday and Thursday, July 27-28, takes us "back stage" to view the heart-catching story of six girls... in a picture as brightly exciting as Broadway itself.

"Walking down Broadway" opens on a New Year's Eve with a big musical production ending its successful run. Almost immediately the film is teamed with drama as six members of the cast sign a pact to meet again at the end of a year—no matter what their careers may bring.

Tight-Wadding It Through Europe

CHAPTER 46
By HAWES

It must have been about July 27, 1937, that I was privileged to take a daylight trip through Germany—and also back through the centuries.

If I were to pick a half dozen "high spots" of the trip, certainly they would include that day long glimpse of the magnificent German countryside in harvest time. Less like a series of scenes of real life, more like a mighty panorama of pictures it lingers in my mind. That day I saw the finest farming I have ever seen, cultivated by methods that have not been used in this section of America for 75 years. There I witnessed the only real peasantry in costumes and in manner of life and of work that I saw in Europe.

The first impression as we left the crowded environs of Berlin was of the intense cultivation of every available yard of space. All along the line there were great mazes of switchyards, which I understand are a part of the military system of transportation. But instead of a wilderness of dirt and cinders, these switchyards were closely gardened in the angles between the tracks. Out along the main lines the grades pitched down steeply and were farmed closely to the very foot. As we rattled through towns and cities, every vacant lot was cultivated.

Perhaps the intense cultivation and toil that I witnessed that day was mostly voluntary but it hardly seemed likely. Men, women and children were laboring virtually in armies, as though under a military discipline. The old system is there prevalent in which the farming population lives in villages. I was most fortunate to see the country in the height of the harvest. All day we passed through scenes of intense labor. Late in the evening I saw occasional bands of men, women and children, trooping in hands back to their homes in the villages. These homes were admirable, for the most part of red brick with red or brown tile roofs, apparently large, well-built, comfortable. They were far better than the average American home. But it hardly seemed that there was much leisure to enjoy them at this time of the year at least.

scenes. But it seemed that not only was I traveling along through space on the Berlin-Paris train but that I was traveling back through the years and the centuries, as Mark Twain's Connecticut Yankee went back to King Arthur's court, or Walt Disney's creations take their fanciful trips of a Sunday evening through the Magic Mirror back to Ali Baba or the Forty-Niners.

The Hanoverian countryside had a somber richness and an undecipherable loveliness that made me long to get off the train and take my way through it slowly. It was a combination of infinite detail in the intensely cultivated foreground, combined with great swings and sweeps of scenery. Through a part of the route I remember a range of mountains off to the north, jutting perpendicularly out of a cultivated plain. We passed a great gap like a gateway through these hills and in the gap was an immense statue, as though a memorial to some great historical personage or event.

There were the throngs of peasant, the women in flowing colorful costumes, toiling with scythes, shovels, mattocks; binding grain by hand with withes of straw; gleaners a la Millet; men driving carts drawn by single oxen or plowing, sometimes with horses but as often with oxen. There was that funeral procession I saw winding along on foot from a little village to a visible cemetery. It was about a quarter of a mile away but the nature of the scene was apparent. It seemed that they marched in some sort of order and that standards with some sort of symbols were carried in front of the procession, part of whom were robed. There were the solemn storks that I saw standing solemnly, always alone, often on one leg, in the pastures and low places. There were the old men I saw herding flocks of geese.

An hour or so out of Berlin and I became conscious with a jerk that there was something I was very used to lacking in the passing scene. What was it? Then it came to me—no cars. Literally no cars at all. In fact everyone was toiling in the fields, except a very few. Once in while a woman trudging along a country road, perhaps carrying or leading a child. A few carts. Once in a great while a bicyclist. But never a car on a rural road from Berlin at 10:57 a. m. to Aachen at 8 p. m. Only a few cars on the streets in towns and cities. No doubt there are through motor roads in Germany where more or less traffic may be seen but never along the Berlin-Paris line, at least on my side of the train. I remember one old lady, seemingly of very advanced age, trudging slowly along a lane, dressed all in great swathes of flowing black which, it seemed, must almost impede her steps, carrying in her arms a sheaf of grain which she had perhaps been permitted to glean in the fields for a few fowls. It seems typical of the intense toil, of the apparent life struggle that was visible from the train.

It seemed most likely, as my mother quoted a talk by Edward Steiner of Grinnell college in a recent letter from Boulder, Colo., there must be millions there who would crawl to America if they had the chance.

I had gone by train through the Norwegian and Swedish countryside, the farming people along the road had stopped and stood at ease as the train went by, laughing and waving their hands, until it almost seemed that we were some sort of Presidential train in triumphal procession, with the countryside cheering us on. It is part of the Scandinavian credo that "it is joyful to travel," reminiscent of Stevenson's saying that "it is better to travel hopefully than to arrive." Anyway they seem to sense your pleasure and share it as the train went by. But none of that in Germany. They bent intently to the task at hand, and I saw only two, a woman and a girl working apart in a potato field, who waved at the train among all the thousands that I passed.

A land of beauty and tragedy it seemed and it is not pertinent here to inquire into the responsibility for the tragedy. But it certainly did not rest with any single one of the toilers who labored in the literal truth of Markham's phrase, "Bowed with the weight of centuries."

One picture that sticks in my head will give an idea of the type of farm work there. In one field three or four men were mowing wheat with scythes. Just outside of them in the stubble several women bound the grain after them, using withes of straw, such as I often made when a boy when the binder missed a bundle. Then outside of these binders, were three women, stooping over, gleaning chance straws which they put in sacks, hung from their necks and pouched loosely in front of them as they stooped over. All these women wore the peasant costumes—some sort of large coarse shoes, long black skirts, and colored blouses and head clothes. Almost a "ringer" it seemed, for Millet's "The Gleaners." Then following or rather outside of the gleaners a few yards in the mowed field was a man with a cart drawn by a white ox, and loaded with some sort of gray substance, apparently a mineral fertilizer, which he was spreading in the stubble. I should say here that the women carried the bundles of grain and made large shocks, almost like young wheat stacks, in order to clear as much of the ground as possible for closely behind the reapers and the gleaners, in the same fields, followed the fertilizer carts and the plows. That was typical of the farming methods, so methodical, so ordered, that it almost seemed that the control must be military.

In fact in one field I saw a number of women and girls binding and gleaning, while a man in some sort of official costume or uniform was standing idly watching them, either in charge or an inspector of some sort. I remember that the golden grain stood higher than the women's heads.

Production was in fact tremendous. I was reared in northern Colorado, where general farming is intense. There I had often seen fields of grain yielding from 50 to 75 bushels per acre and even more. But to appearances the best of northern Colorado was no better than the average of Germany. The strip system was much in use, the fields consisting of strips perhaps 150 feet wide and quite long, with a variety of crops in succession—a strip of potatoes, then of beets, then of hay or some other crop. Potatoes were being dug by hand. There were a few binders in the grain fields, but unlike American makes. They had reels of about four slats as compared with about six or more slats in an American binder reel. Also threshing was in progress. They had large threshing machines, unlike any I have ever seen here, and a universal feature was a baling attachment, so the straw came out in bales instead of being blown on a stack. It was hauled immediately from the machine to great sheds. No straw was left on the ground unsheltered even in bales. Strangely to me, there were more women working about the threshing machines than men.

I understand that there is now in effect in Germany a four-year plan designed to increase German farm production for both food and chemical purposes, and that the provisions of this plan make it criminal not only to leave ground vacant but to neglect cultivation or to produce less than the maximum, if true, this would explain the intensity of culture and toil. It seemed strange to an American—this jealous conservation of every square yard, almost every square foot. I remember fronting the track in our progress through one old lady, seemingly of very advanced age, trudging slowly along a lane, dressed all in great swathes of flowing black which, it seemed, must almost impede her steps, carrying in her arms a sheaf of grain which she had perhaps been permitted to glean in the fields for a few fowls. It seems typical of the intense toil, of the apparent life struggle that was visible from the train.

Returning to Mackinac City they spent the evening in the old fort there, where they were entertained in the tepee of the Chief of the Ottawa Tribe of Indians. The old Chief told them stories which his Grandfather had told to him when he was a boy. Wednesday, taking the bus across the ferry, they motored to Sault Sainte Marie, where they visited the locks and took pictures of the big boats passing through. As most of the group had never been in Canada they took the ferry over and ate their dinners there. They drove through Fort Brady and stopped at the Indian Village, St. Ignace where the girls bought souvenirs to bring home. Thursday they started home by highway no. 131, stopping at the State Park at Cadillac and making camp for the night.
